A long time ago...

LEGEND OF THE FALLS

The Caingangue indigenous people, who lived on the banks of the Iguaçu River, believed that the world was ruled by M'boi – a serpent-shaped god and son of Tupã. Igobi, the tribe's chief, had a daughter, Naipi, so beautiful that the river's waters would pause whenever the young girl gazed into them. Because of her beauty, Naipi was to be consecrated to the god M'boi, dedicating her life to his worship.

Among the Caingangues, however, there was a young warrior named Tarobá, who fell in love with Naipi the moment he saw her. On the day of Naipi's consecration ceremony, while the shaman and the chiefs drank cauim (a fermented corn drink) and the warriors danced, Tarobá fled with the beautiful Naipi in a canoe, carried away by the river's current.

When M'boi learned of their escape, he was furious. He plunged deep into the earth, twisting his body and creating a giant fissure that formed the waterfalls. Swept away by the waters of this immense cascade, the canoe and the fugitives fell from a great height, disappearing forever.

Naipi was transformed into one of the central rocks of the Falls, eternally lashed by the raging waters. Tarobá was turned into a palm tree, leaning over the river's abyss. Beneath this tree lies the entrance to a grotto where the vengeful god forever watches over his two victims.
